Social work resourceBy Thomas TruthsayerDo you have interns at your work place and you have been chosen by the gods to direct them? Do you vacillate from total awe to pure terror due to your ignorance when your interns throw buzz terms and ideas at you because you have not set foot in a college class room for three decades or more? If so... well, it is time to brush up and throw ideas and terms at them! Read these articles provided and have fun by throwing out questions like "Ah...that is a good point but what do you think of this case in the light of a cognitive/ behavioral mind set!" Get these encyclopedias and brush up on your social work theories and ideas today! I love them and use these for ideas for on going teaching classes too!

The Encyclopedia of Social Work, 19th Edition is the field's most comprehensive reference work for the general knowledge base of the profession. Three volumes provide nearly 3,000 pages of information on virtually every aspect of social work. All of the 19th edition's 290 entries are new, and several areas of interest are covered in greater depth than before. Expanded content areas include new technologies, research, global changes, U.S. policy developments, evolving roles for social workers, and knowledge development. The editors of the 19th edition included more entries on women and people of color and increased the diversity in the Encyclopedia's authorship. Of the over 300 contributors--academics or social work practitioners--the majority are women, and one-quarter are authors of color. Each volume contains a complete table of contents and full index. "Reader's Guides" list all the entries that relate to a topic. "See" references lead readers to specific entries, and "See Also" references ensure that they find all the information related to a topic. Key words for each entry provide another search tool to help readers find content. The Encyclopedia is a solid investment that will provide years of practical service as a one-stop resource for looking up facts, preparing papers, supplementing course work, initiating literature searches, and informing social work practice.
